Earth has gone to Hell in a handbasket and Theda is barely holding on Drug-addicted Theda has a unique gift that might have been useful in a world that believed in something. Not in New Earth. Using her gift now that the god has come and gone is the one thing punishable by death, and Theda isn't the kind of girl to take too many chances. There are just two things that matter to her: tricking out her gift so she can eat, and blissing out on her drug of choice so she can forget the past--not exactly in that order.

Her craving for a fix gets her into deadly trouble when a rugged bounty hunter as damaged as she is discovers her secret. Now she must find a way to shake her addiction if she is to trust the very handsome and tortured hero who ends up saving her from certain execution.

Sick and jonesing, one question still nags at her: what terrible secret forced him to save her?

FROM THE AUTHOR: Most readers love or hate the Theta Waves trilogy. This end of the world romance has a strong female lead, fantasy mixed in with the new adult dystopian romance, and fallen angels who take part in the post apocalypse. If you like mercenary romance with a different type of telepathic romance as a side, you might like it. If you're easily offended, Thea suggests you bypass this end of the world series and try the Witches of Etlantium series instead; both are NA romance, but with different levels of steam.
